How is rejecting reality (biology) not evidence that a person is mentally unfit (ill), and thus making that person unqualified to serve. There is little difference in this than over those who believe and argue for a "flat earth" despite the overwhelming evidence to the contrary. The motivation is different, but the argument is the same. This person is a MedBoard for Mental Wellness waiting to happen. What a waste of military resources and funding!

You're a chaplain in the Army, charged with the nurture of the living, care for the wounded and honor of the fallen. To have extremist views against a group of people, especially voiced in public on social media, is deplorable and disgusting. I feel awful for the soldiers and families you are entrusted to provide counseling and mentorship to. You should be ashamed.

This is not extreme in the slightest. It's the very definition of conservative. To tell a Soldier to keep running in formation when he has clearly broken his ankle (or even sprained it) is deplorable and uncaring toward the Soldier. To tell someone they are ill, sick, misunderstanding, wrong, etc. is the kindest thing that another person can do for him or her. If you're an alcoholic (even a "functioning" one) and I don't say something to you, that would tell you how caring I am or not toward you. The most nurturing counsel I can give to someone who is under the delusion of transgenderism (gender dysphoria) is to recommend professional clinical counseling to assist in the healing process. To not do so, and merely pander to make-believe social whims of the moment, is not only damaging but idiocy. Furthermore, by doing so, I am affirming his/her essential value and human dignity by my true and deeply held care for his/her holistic wellness. So, I am not ashamed or afraid to boldly do the very job I am hired to do.

Cruz Mejia it is specifically my job to make judgments on ethics and morals, and a religious perspective is part of that judgment. This is my job and due diligence.

Andrew Calvert it's not your job to incorporate personal opinion into matters such as human rights. If your job truly incorporates ethics, then disrespecting someone's gender identity and confusing that with sex is an ethical issue within itself. You're not looking out for the welfare of others while essentially saying trans people live in a state of delusion. In fact, it enables folks within the LGBT community to not have trust in the spiritual part of your job.
